Some people are confused by CSS Specificity, especially with all of the (not-so) new CSS3 Selectors. The image below may help make sense of CSS Specificity.

CSS Specificity â€“ Standardista

Use a class when you want to consistently style multiple elements throughout the page/site. Classes are useful when you have, or possibly will have in the future, more than one element that shares the same style. An example may be a div of "comments" or a certain list style to use for related links.

There are lots of ways you can select elements in CSS. The most basic selection is by tag name, like `p { }`. Almost anything more specific than a tag selector uses attributes â€“ class and ID both select on those attributes on HTML elements. But class and ID aren't the only attributes developers can select. We can use any of an element's attributes as selectors.
